

In the past, before the no call list, I would get calls from long-distance telephone companies, credit card companies, magazine companies, and many others soliciting their products. I would tell one person "no" but still get calls later from someone else at the same company asking me to buy their product or service. They just didn't seem to want to take "no" for an answer and were getting pretty bothersome. At that time, my mother was still alive, and she would be taking such calls during the day. I think she got talked into purchasing items that she didn't really need. So when the "no call list" in Wisconsin came about, I signed up right away. I was very relieved when the soliciting calls disappeared. When the Federal "no call list" was announced, I quickly signed up for that also.

Over the years since, I have been really relieved not to have to take all the annoying soliciting phone calls for products or service that I had received in the past. I do not wish to have them start up again. That is why I am writing this letter, to urge the Federal Communications Commission not to doing anything to affect the current no call laws. I do not wish to have telemarketers from companies that I have formerly been associated with be allowed to bother and harass me with telephone calls. I do not want the incessant calls trying to reclaim me as a customer to start up again. If I want to become a customer with some company, I will solicit them. I am not interested in again receiving numerous different credit card, long-distance telephone companies or other companies having the opportunity to start up again with their telemarketing calls with all their "deals" that I am not really interested in.

I urge you to please do nothing to change the current no call laws in the State of Wisconsin or in any other state.
